Gavin Newsom would like lawmakers to turn California into a safe-sex utopia, but it may be too late. Statewide, 378 people were diagnosed with HIV in the first four months of the year, according to newly released numbers from the state. Of those, 241 cases (62.8 percent) involved people who have sex with men. Virtually no one who contracts HIV in the next 10 years will live to see the decade pass, said Dr. Jonathan Shur, executive director of the California Department of Public Health. And it's not because of the sun, the air or some other magical quality of California. "It's that when they get infected, they become infected and then HIV is a relentless and deadly disease," Shur said. California's HIV case rate over the past decade has been higher than the national rate since the epidemic began rising in the late 1980s, but Shur said the state has seen small decreases in recent years. "The case incidence has stabilized," Shur said, "but we've got a long way to go before it goes down." The state's best hopes for a decrease in HIV infection lie in education efforts and prevention programs. Those programs have the opportunity to help gay men avoid contracting HIV. Shur said. "We have to educate people on how to protect themselves, how to practice safe sex," Shur said. A California man told The Times that he made a mistake and contracted HIV from an infected syringe from a hotel room at the Rio Hotel and Casino in Las Vegas. Anyone can get HIV, Shur said, but most people contract the disease through heterosexual contact. Only about 2 percent of the cases in the current wave of infections are attributed to heterosexual transmission. "The vast majority of people getting infected in the state are infected through people who have been infected with HIV and they are not infected through an injection," Shur said. "They are getting infected through sex." The numbers of new infections are so high that Shur said California needs to "double the scale" of its prevention strategies. d4474df7b8
