Selecting physician or nurse practitioner leaders: what can the next generation learn from the leaders of today? Physician and nurse practitioner (NP) leaders must not only lead healthcare organizations but also society and the world at large. Yet, with our focus on technology and science that can "fix" the world, we may ignore the impact that leaders of the "other half" of the profession have to offer to creating the future of medicine. Unfortunately, medicine has evolved into a highly competitive arena, and the winner will be the organization that best manages its people. We must use the tools of the nurse-based profession to avoid this outcome. We must use NP models of leadership that address the important issues facing healthcare in the next generation. As new healthcare leaders are emerging, it is important to prepare them for the future of medicine by identifying and understanding the leadership and management models that are available to them. As new healthcare leaders emerge in the future, they will be evaluated on the manner in which they choose to lead the challenges of medicine. They will be measured on how they manage their teams, their patients, and their organizations. In this article, we focus on these subjects in the context of the leadership, management, and behavior of the NP.Q: d4474df7b8
