Although the underlying mechanisms and functional significance of these observations remain to be fully elucidated, they are compatible with a model in which nucleophosmin mediates tumor cell migration through regulation of the actin cytoskeleton. This mechanism was originally described in the context of membrane ruffling, but has since been implicated in cell motility. For example, the cytoskeleton-associated GTPase RhoA can mediate cell migration through stimulation of the formation of actin stress fibers and focal adhesions

\[[@B36]-[@B38]\]. Nucleophosmin was previously implicated in the regulation of RhoA activity \[[@B14],[@B39]\]. In summary, our findings provide evidence for an unexpected role of nucleophosmin in the regulation of cell motility. We propose that nucleophosmin acts through modulating actin polymerization and cell migration. This mechanism could be responsible for the aggressive nature of certain cancers, and suggests the nucleophosmin pathway as a potential target for the development of anti-cancer drugs. Conclusions =====

Nucleophosmin is a multifunctional protein whose expression is frequently altered in human cancers. Here, we demonstrate that nucleophosmin promotes cell migration through modulation of the actin cytoskeleton. We propose that nucleophosmin acts through mediating actin filament formation. This mechanism could be responsible for the aggressive nature of some cancers and suggests the nucleophosmin pathway as a potential target for anti-cancer drug development.
