Reverse viral indirect fluorescent antibody testings were performed on 53 pregnant women with a history of unilateral rubella; 29 had had symptoms in the first trimester and 24 had had maternofetal disease later in pregnancy. A 1:100 dilution of maternal serum was utilized for the testing. Group A comprised of 22 women with single pregnancies in the first trimester, of which eight (36%) had a total IgG titer of 1:800 or more; Group B comprised of 17 women with single pregnancies and maternofetal disease occurring in the second trimester, of which 12 (71%) had a total IgG titer of 1:800 or more. Group C consisted of 12 women with multiple pregnancy in the second trimester, of which four (33%) had a total IgG titer of 1:800 or more. In seven (17%) of the 35 rubella IgG negative women in Group B, IgG concentrations in cord blood were higher than in maternal blood, suggesting placental transfer., with a bulk modulus which only moderately increases, when the interlayer spacing is reduced. The overall results presented in this study help to clarify these issues.
