Didn't even get to the point of answering my question lol. Model-dependent and model-independent reconstruction of tissue volume using Fourier-transform tomography. In imaging experiments, tissue volume reconstruction is often performed by considering the sample as a sum of voxels with different gray values. This approach is accurate only if the value of the gray-level distribution is known for all tissue types. In medical imaging, if the value of the gray-level distribution is known, it can be directly used for the reconstruction. In this work, we present a new method that is independent of gray-level distribution. In particular, we use the central moments of the voxels to describe the properties of the gray-level distribution. This approach is independent of the gray-level distribution and is therefore applicable in cases where the value of the distribution cannot be determined. The method is based on Fourier-transform tomography and the regularization method adaptivity. The proposed method is evaluated by simulations and experiments. The results show that the results of the new method are superior to the results of the reconstruction methods based on the gray-level distribution. This invention relates to a molding system for the molding of composite structures of honeycomb material and matrix material, more specifically a molding system consisting of an injection molding machine and a mold insert which may consist of a steel plate to which a foamed honeycomb structure
