HAPPY CANADIAN WEDDING. Researchers are discovering that America may be the first to have succumbed to climate change, many centuries before human industrial development could possibly have caused it, and this is all the more troubling, as the researchers are only now reporting the age of the collapse of the Tulip City, located in Maryland, as being "as old as Stonehenge." The researchers report that Tulip City was first discovered by accident during a geophysics survey and that it was found to be old, having a depth of 8 meters. The depth of the collapsed Tulip City is 6 to 7 meters, which indicates that the Tulip City likely collapsed sometime during the late Pleistocene (11,000 to 7,000 years ago), which appears to be when climate change may have begun, again just before the first evidence of humans. As the researchers from the Polish Academy of Science in Warsaw continue to explore other parts of the region, they have established a correlation with the sites of Stonehenge and the French megaliths (of which there are several across France). All of these sites appear to have been constructed during the same period (just before the first major settlement of Europe), which may indicate that all of them were part of a worldwide megalithic culture. They have also established an age of
