Most of the answers point to using wire mesh screen to retain smaller kitchen waste. However, I have also seen recommendations for a commercial compost bin with a concrete base. A person suggested that the earthworms are not attracted to the concrete and left their mulch (decomposed organic materials, similar to the materials being composted) on the top. My question is, what is the advantage of using concrete vs mesh to retain the compost? If the earthworms are not attracted to the concrete, why would mesh be preferred? A: Wire mesh will not provide as much oxygen to your compost as a concrete base will. It will also build up heat in your compost heap, which is good for the organisms but not such a good thing if you're planning on cooking in it. Concrete offers similar benefits and won't build up as much heat. It also provides a more defined area to turn your compost. If you're planning on making large batches of compost, such as to feed a wide area or make large quantities of mulch, it will certainly help to build a concrete base. This is because you'd need to turn your compost more frequently. Q: Installing a.deb file on Ubuntu 18.04/18.10 On a new installation of Ubuntu 18.04/18.10 on a
